

Making your job search easier: let your resume do the hard work

Look at your resume and honestly ask yourself:

1. Do the descriptions of your past legal work give a potential employer a real picture of what matters you've handled;
2. Will the reader understand the general areas of law you know and the specific issues you've addressed; and
3. Most importantly, what added value did you provide to your previous client? Was your theory of the case, research, writing, or even your oral argument successful? Did you save her time or money?

Showcasing your successes better on your resume will likely win you an interview!
